

Mission Statement

George Balanchine and Lincoln Kirstein formed New York City Ballet with the goal of producing and performing a new ballet repertory that would reimagine the principles of classical dance. Under the leadership of Ballet Master in Chief Peter Martins, the Company remains dedicated to their vision as it pursues two primary objectives:

1. to preserve the ballets, dance aesthetic, and standards of excellence created and established by its founders; and
2. to develop new work that draws on the creative talents of contemporary choreographers and composers, and speaks to the time in which it is made.

This mission is accompanied by a commitment to expand the Company's audience and make ballet accessible to the widest possible public through touring, education programs, the creative use of media, and other outreach efforts.

Remembering Balanchine

This year marked the centennial of our founder George Balanchine, and we set about remembering him in part by mounting the largest celebration of its kind. I say in part because in so many ways Balanchine remains with us today in every aspect of our endeavor. We continue to perform his ballets, most of which were produced here, with the same devotion to aesthetic nuance as when he was alive. Celebration or business as usual, we continue to dance more Balanchine works each year than any company on the face of the earth.

For those of us who knew and worked with Balanchine, he remains very much part of our world. We recall him each day through our enterprise, the New York City Ballet, and by honoring the things that he taught us- a way of living and working that keeps his influence vibrant here, more than twenty years since his passing.

Balanchine's centennial presented us with an opportunity not only to celebrate his achievement but also to introduce his work to a new generation. We devoted ourselves to telling his story in a new way. Our traditional seasons were arranged into two distinct "galleries," if you will. The winter season, which I called "Heritage," included the ballets that influenced Balanchine as a youth growing up in St. Petersburg, as well as early dances of his own. The spring season was devoted to his "Vision," including the extraordinary results of his partnership with Igor Stravinsky, as well as a creative output too vast and varied to easily catalogue here.

Balanchine was one of the most skilled musicians ever to become a choreographer, and we recognized this by grouping the spring into three music festivals: European, American, and Russian. This approach also gave us an opportunity to reflect on his impact as the director of our company by performing work that he commissioned or inspired, including ballets by Jerome Robbins, myself, and other choreographers. And since Balanchine loved new work, we commissioned four ballets, one each by Susan Stroman, Christopher Wheeldon, myself, and the contemporary St. Petersburg choreographer Boris Eifman. Nearly half a million people saw the Company dance this year. In addition to performing in New York, the Company appeared in St. Petersburg and Denmark, where we began our centennial celebration with weeklong engagements, in Saratoga Springs, and at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C., where we returned for the first time in 17 years. Millions more saw us perform on PBS in a special live program "Live From Lincoln Center: Lincoln Center Celebrates Balanchine 100," hosted by Sarah Jessica Parker, which included a remarkable roster of artists from other Lincoln Center constituents honoring Balanchine's achievements.

Our exhibition-like approach to Balanchine was enhanced by a comprehensive exhibit within the New York State Theater. We are especially grateful to Edward Bigelow, John Braden, and Nancy Norman Lassalle for their contributions to this exhibit and its accompanying catalogue, as well as to the NYCB Archive, which has become an invaluable resource to the Company.

None of the centennial celebration would have been possible without the incomparable artists and staff of New York City Ballet, who accept every challenge with passion. Nor would it have been possible without our patrons and board leadership. I would especially like to recognize Howard Solomon, honorary chairman for Balanchine 100, whose efforts greatly enhanced our celebration.

Throughout the year we often mused that one of Balanchine's greatest contributions to ballet was the audience that he nurtured here in postwar New York. Through its steadfast support, this group continues to keep Balanchine's achievement alive by supporting the works he made and inspired, and by generously aiding our Company's development of dancers and imaginative new ballets that speak to our time-just as Mr. B would have wanted.

Meeting the Demands of a Centennial Celebration

One of the things that has made New York City Ballet's celebration of Balanchine's centennial so remarkable, over and above the artistry of the performances, is the depth of feeling and support from our audience. This is my first year as chairman and although I served for many years as a director of the board, this year I gained an even keener sense of this astonishing relationship.

I am a relative newcomer to dance, having only discovered New York City Ballet some 15 years ago at the invitation of business associates. That evening proved to be an eye-opening experience, unlike anything I might have imagined—exceeding all my expectations. I realized that there was something extraordinary happening in the theater, which was expressed with brilliance and nuance beyond anything I had experienced.

Serving the Company as chairman during a festival year, I also have a better understanding of what is necessary to provide Peter Martins and our Company with the right environment for their work. It isn't just about money, although money and resources are important. Far more necessary is the support of a committed and broad-based community that shares the Company's ideal of classical ballet as well as its uncompromising standard of excellence.

The financial statements within this report describe our fiscal results in this centennial year. Our annual operations supported extensive activities and, despite a difficult environment for the classical arts, closed with a nearly balanced budget. At the same time, our endowed funds grew by more than $15 million through strong investment results and from contributions to The Campaign for New York City Ballet. The success of the campaign has been made possible not only by lead gifts from members of our board and other generous patrons, but also by contributions from some 2,000 Guild members, whose commitment to our artistic excellence is truly inspiring.

Our financial results speak to careful stewardship by the Company's management, along with the continuing support of our board, advisory board, and patrons, whose help makes it possible to expand upon New York City Ballet's outstanding record of achievement. I would especially like to recognize four directors who have been instrumental in our accomplishments and who completed board terms this year. We are grateful to Marilyn Laurie, Denise Saul, and Bonnie Strauss for their eight years of board service, as well as to Earle Mack, who resigned from the board to accept a presidential appointment as United States ambassador to Finland. We very much hope that they will remain close to the Company.

We believe that the excitement generated during Balanchine 100: The Centennial Celebration will serve us very well in the year ahead. Despite our share of challenges, I am confident that we can look forward to future seasons with great enthusiasm.

Balanchine 100: The Centennial Celebration 2003-2004

The Centennial Celebration Commences

The 2003-2004 season began like any other with New York City Ballet returning to upstate New York in July for its annual summer residency at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center. Over a three-week period, more than 55,000 people, the highest attendance in recent history, enjoyed performances that included a number of repertory favorites by George Balanchine and Jerome Robbins, three full-length ballets—Balanchine's A Midsummer Night's Dream and Coppélia (staged with Alexandra Danilova) and Peter Martins' Swan Lake—and newer works such as Christopher Wheeldon's Carnival of the Animals, which premiered at the New York State Theater earlier that year. What distinguished this 38th Saratoga Performing Arts Center residency from many in the past is that days were spent not only rehearsing for performances there, but also preparing the repertory that the Company would take to Russia on what was to be its first visit in 30 years, marking the start of "Balanchine 100: The Centennial Celebration," a year-long salute to the centennial of Company co-founder George Balanchine's birth.

A salute to Mr. B at the Opening Night of the Balanchine 100: The Centennial Celebration

Bringing Balanchine Back—Return to Russia

On the eve of Monday, July 28, 2004, less than 48 hours after the final performance in Saratoga Springs, the Company departed for St. Petersburg, Balanchine's birthplace, to perform at the Mariinsky Theater, where Balanchine began his career. The occasion, in addition to being part of yearlong celebrations that would mark Balanchine's centennial worldwide, was the 300th anniversary of the city of St. Petersburg, and New York City Ballet had been invited by Valery Gergiev, general director of the Mariinsky, to appear as the closing attraction of the "Stars of the White Nights Festival."

Peter Martins and his artistic staff, several of whom had visited Russia with Balanchine in 1972, carefully planned three distinct programs for this historic visit. On Wednesday, July 30, NYCB opened its weeklong appearance with an all-Balanchine performance that featured Serenade, Symphony in Three Movements, and Symphony in C. From the opening strains of the Tchaikovsky to the thunderous brass and meditative strings of the Stravinsky, both conducted by Maestro Gergiev with the marvelous Kirov Orchestra, to the joyous conclusion of the Bizet under the baton of NYCB Music Director Andrea Quinn, it was a spine-tingling performance that will live in memory, beautifully danced and met with rhythmic applause and ovations by the Russian audience.

Program number two featured works by NYCB's co-founding choreographer, Jerome Robbins. If Russian audiences were less familiar with Stravinsky and the angular, athletic style Balanchine employed in Symphony in Three Movements, they were even less prepared for Robbins and the three different styles presented on this program, which included Interplay, Dances at a Gathering, and Glass Pieces. Unprepared, perhaps, but Russian audiences received Jerome Robbins' ballets with great enthusiasm and these performances, too, received standing ovations. Concluding NYCB's engagement was a mixed program that opened with Balanchine's Concerto Barocco and continued with Agon and Peter Martins' Hallelujah Junction, both of which captivated the Russians. The third program concluded with a rousing Western Symphony, by which time audiences were again on their feet as the curtain descended on the full cast. In all, some 10,000 people saw NYCB's performances in St. Petersburg.

The reception that NYCB received in Russia was extremely gratifying even though the trip was not without its challenges. A feature-length documentary film on the tour has been produced and will be released in 2006. It includes performance excerpts and records the process of preparing for the tour as well as the experiences of individual dancers, ballet masters, and other Company personnel in being part of this historic occasion.

The tour to St. Petersburg would not have been possible without lead gifts from a number of generous NYCB patrons: Gillian Atfield/ Harriet Ford Dickenson Foundation, Anne H. Bass, The Brown Foundation, Inc., Catherine and Ephraim Gildor, Larry and Michele Herbert/Pantone, Inc., Veronique and Bob Pittman, and Howard Solomon. Support for the trip was also provided by William I. Campbell and Christine Wächter-Campbell and NCH Capital Inc.

On to Copenhagen

Following St. Petersburg, the Company returned to New York for a short rest and additional rehearsals to prepare for a weeklong appearance at Tivoli Gardens in Copenhagen, where Balanchine also worked for a time as a guest ballet master with the Royal Danish Ballet before coming to the United States. NYCB was last seen in Denmark in 1993, 10 years after Balanchine's death. This engagement offered Peter Martins, who in the fall of 2003 reached the milestone of 20 years at the helm of NYCB, an opportunity to present in his homeland a company that bears the mark of his influence as well as that of Balanchine, Robbins, and Lincoln Kirstein. In addition to some of the signature repertory that was presented in St. Petersburg, the Company also performed works by NYCB Resident Choreographer Christopher Wheeldon, William Forsythe, and Richard Tanner, demonstrating the range of choreographic talents that have both defined and been shaped at New York City Ballet. In all, the Company staged 14 works over the course of seven performances from September 2 through 7, reaching more than 11,000 audience members.

Winter Season—Heritage

Balanchine 100 festivities at home officially got under way on November 25, 2003 with the Company's Opening Night Benefit, which featured a special program illustrating the breadth of Balanchine's genius. From the stage of the New York State Theater, Mayor Michael Bloomberg introduced New York's First Lady, Libby Pataki, who read a proclamation in honor of Balanchine's centennial. The curtain then rose on students from the School of American Ballet performing the first movement of Serenade with Company members performing the rest of the ballet. Balanchine's exotic Bugaku, which was inspired by the music and ceremony of Japan, followed in the only performance of this work during the centennial season. The gala performance concluded with Symphony in C, one of Balanchine's most dazzling creations and a signature work for New York City Ballet. NYCB Music Director Andrea Quinn and Principal Conductor Hugo Fiorato shared the podium that evening, which also marked the first performance of Arturo Delmonico and Kurt Nikkanen in their shared post as concertmasters of the New York City Ballet Orchestra. The benefit raised more than $1.2 million for the Company thanks in large measure to the hard work of event chairmen Isabella Rossellini and Lilly Samuels Tartikoff and corporate chairs Mr. and Mrs. Samuel A. DiPiazza, Jr. of PricewaterhouseCoopers, which generously sponsored the evening.

The season continued with New York City Ballet's annual presentation of George Balanchine's The Nutcracker™. This beloved production opened on November 28 and ran for 46 performances through January 4, 2004, drawing an audience of 112,216. A number of dancers made debuts in principal and solo roles throughout the run. On November 29, principal dancer Sofiane Sylve, who came to the Company from the Dutch National Ballet in the fall of 2003, debuted as Dewdrop. Joaquin De Luz, who joined the Company at the start of the Balanchine Centennial Celebration, and Megan Fairchild made debuts together as the Cavalier and Sugarplum Fairy at the Nutcracker Family Benefit on Saturday, December 13. This event, hosted annually by New York City Ballet and the School of American Ballet, raised nearly $500,000 for SAB scholarships and the Company's education programs. Ide Dangoor, Serene Lese, and Veronique Pittman co-chaired the event and were joined by Katie Couric, who served as honorary chairman. Later in the Nutcracker season, corps de ballet member Carrie Lee Riggins also made her debut as Dewdrop.

Alexandra Ansanelli, Amanda Hanks and Nilas Martins in Peter Martins' The Sleeping Beauty

The winter repertory season, which was programmed as a celebration of Balanchine's heritage, ran from January 6 through February 29, 2004. The season featured a number of Balanchine's early works as well as ballets that influenced him, including several of the great full-length ballets that were at the forefront of the dance world in Russia during Balanchine's formative years. The season opened with Balanchine's A Midsummer Night's Dream, in a nod to Shakespeare's first-ever appearance on stage as a young boy in a production of the Shakespearean comedy. Audiences also enjoyed performances of Coppélia and Harlequinade, as well as Peter Martins' stagings of Swan Lake and The Sleeping Beauty, seminal works originally created by Marius Petipa to commissioned scores by Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky, both important influences on Balanchine and the ballet world as a whole.

The season also included works by two other choreographers who inspired Balanchine: Michel Fokine and August Bournonville. Fokine's Chopiniana, the first plotless ballet Balanchine encountered as a youth, was performed by students from the School of American Ballet. Bournonville's Flower Festival in Genzano, which influenced Balanchine's Scotch Symphony and Donizetti Variations, also performed during the winter, featured the Royal Danish Ballet's Gudrun Bojesen and Thomas Lund as guest artists. Caroline Cavallo, also from the Royal Danish Ballet, performed as a guest artist in Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 2 and as Odette/Odile in Swan Lake, roles she had previously danced with her home company.

Promenade and birthday cake provided by Payard.

In a nod to Balanchine's pioneering work for theater and film, the winter season also featured a world premiere by Tony Award-winning Broadway director and choreographer Susan Stroman. Double Feature, an evening-length work set in two acts, is an homage to the silent film era. The first half, "The Blue Necklace," featured Maria Kowroski, Ashley Boudier, Damian Woetzel, Kyra Nichols, and Megan Fairchild in a melodramatic tale of loss and discovery set to music by Irving Berlin. Part two, "Makin' Whoopee!," is a retelling of the classic Buster Keaton comedy "Seven Chances" set to music by Walter Donaldson. Tom Gold performed the lead role, a young man in need of cash who must find a bride in less than a day or forfeit a $7 million inheritance, and Alexandra Ansanelli portrayed his sweetheart. With a creative team that included William Ivey Long (costumes), Robin Wagner (sets), Glen Kelly (music arrangements and libretto, the latter co-written with Stroman), Doug Besterman and Danny Troob (orchestrations), and NYCB Lighting Designer Mark Stanley, as well as a cast of 60 dancers, Double Feature quickly became one of the hottest tickets of the season. The production was made possible in part by lead gifts from Perry and Marty Granoff, Point Gammon Foundation, and The Shen Family Foundation. Additional funding for the ballet was provided by The Blanche and Irving Laurie Foundation, the New York State Council on the Arts through the Dance Commissions program, and contributors to the New Combinations and Repertory Funds.

Alexandra Ansanelli and Tom Gold in "Makin' Whoopee!" from Susan Stroman's Double Feature.

Teresa Reichlen and ensemble in Rubies from George Balanchine's Jewels.

In February, New York City Ballet presented five performances of Balanchine's ground-breaking full-length ballet, Jewels. The Company had not performed Jewels in its entirety since 1999, during New York City Ballet's 50th anniversary celebration. For the Balanchine Centennial, the production's original designer, Peter Harvey, was invited to create new décor for the ballet, which resulted in a different treatment for each of the work's three sections: Emeralds, Rubies, and Diamonds.

Jewels also served as the focal point of New York City Ballet's Annual Luncheon program on February 3. NYCB board member and CBS correspondent Lesley Stahl moderated a panel discussion featuring Peter Martins, Sean Lavery, and Wendy Whelan, with New York City Ballet dancers performing excerpts from the ballet. During the luncheon, Peter Martins presented corps de ballet member Daniel Ulbricht with the Janice Levin Dancer Award, which was established in 2000 with a generous endowment gift from longtime NYCB board member Janice Levin. The award recognizes a promising young member of the Company who also studied at the School of American Ballet. Mr. Ulbricht began his studies at SAB in 1999, became an apprentice with New York City Ballet in 2000, and joined the Company in November 2001. Anne Grauso, Susan Krysiwicz, and Alexandra Lebenthal joined Lesley Stahl in chairing the luncheon, which raised some $375,000 for the Company and Balanchine 100. The jeweler, H. Stern, was the sponsor and Ronaldo Stern the chairman.

A Warm Welcome in the Nation's Capital

Immediately following the winter season during the first week of March, New York City Ballet took to the road again, this time heading to Washington, D.C., to perform at the Kennedy Center after an absence of 17 years. This much anticipated appearance, billed by the Kennedy Center as one of the major highlights of its season, was helped by musicians' union contract negotiations at both institutions in 2002 that resulted in an agreement enabling the NYCB Orchestra and Kennedy Center Opera House Orchestra to perform with the Company in alternate years.

The opportunity to be seen in the nation's capital and to perform for an audience that includes national and international leaders was especially meaningful during this landmark year. As on its earlier tours in the year, NYCB presented three distinct programs that were specially planned to showcase the Company's signature Balanchine repertory. The first of these, performed on Wednesday, March 3 and repeated the evening of Saturday, March 6, opened with Serenade, followed by Apollo and Symphony in C; Andrea Quinn and Hugo Fiorato led the Kennedy Center's orchestra. Program two, presented on Thursday, March 4 and at the Saturday matinee, featured Concerto Barocco, Prodigal Son, and Tschaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 2 with Mr. Fiorato and Maurice Kaplow conducting. Balanchine's full-length Jewels completed the repertory presented during the engagement, with one performance on Friday, March 5, two on Sunday, March 7, and Andrea Quinn again at the podium. All three programs met with enthusiastic response and ovations from near sold-out audiences. Nearly 14,000 people attended over the course of seven performances.

Placido Domingo performing "None but the Lonely Heart" for the 2004 Spring Gala "Live from Lincoln Center: Lincoln Center Celebrates Balanchine 100."

conducted the NYCB Orchestra that evening. Shambards is the tenth work that Mr. Wheeldon has choreographed for the Company, and it marked the first time that he had worked with a composer on a commissioned score.

Wheeldon's work as New York City Ballet's Resident Choreographer during the centennial year was made possible by a lead grant from the Geoffrey C. Hughes Foundation and a generous gift from Xenia Krinitzky Roff. The European Music Festival was sponsored in part by Movado with major support from The Florence Gould Foundation for French programming.

Peter Martins' Chichester Psalms

On May 5, New York City Ballet presented a special Spring Gala performance featuring a Lincoln Center-wide tribute to George Balanchine's life and work. Broadcast nationwide on the PBS program "Live From Lincoln Center: Lincoln Center Celebrates Balanchine 100" brought together all 12 of the performing arts organizations that make their home at Lincoln Center for a star-studded performance, which included excerpts from seven Balanchine ballets performed by New York City Ballet dancers and students from the School of American Ballet. Among the guest artists appearing were Plácido Domingo, who performed "None but the Lonely Heart," one of Balanchine's favorite songs; Wynton Marsalis, as trumpet soloist for "The Man I Love" pas de deux from Who Cares?; Kevin Kline, who introduced rare film clips and archival footage of Balanchine narrated by Susan Stroman; Roberto Minczuk and Carter Brey of the New York Philharmonic; Gil Shaham and Adele Anthony representing The Juilliard School; Cho-Liang Lin from The Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center; and Nancy Allen Lundy, Jan Opalach, Jennifer Roderer, and Bruce Sledge from New York City Opera. Actress Sarah Jessica Parker served as mistress of ceremonies for the performance and broadcast. The gala performance was also

Spring Season—Vision

Balanchine 100 resumed at the New York State Theater on April 27. The nine-week spring season ran through June 27, 2004 and provided a comprehensive look at Balanchine's artistic vision and his influence on subsequent generations of choreographers. Of the 64 works presented during the season, 42 were by Balanchine and 12 by Jerome Robbins. In keeping with Balanchine's belief that music is the source from which movement is drawn and with a New York City Ballet tradition—which Balanchine initiated—of presenting musical tributes, the season was divided into three festivals celebrating the music of Europe, America, and Russia.

The first of these, a four-week European Music Festival, was a showcase for the music of 23 composers whose works inspired such favorite ballets by Balanchine as Vienna Waltzes, Square Dance, Divertimento No. 15, and La Valse. In addition, the European Music Festival featured special tributes to the music of France, Germany, Austria, Great Britain, and Italy, which were introduced from the curtain on their respective evenings with remarks by cultural representatives from each country.

The European Music Festival also featured the first of four new ballets presented during the spring season. Christopher Wheeldon's Shambards, set to "Piano Concerto No. 2" by Scottish composer James MacMillan, premiered on Saturday, May 8 to critical acclaim; Mr. MacMillan simulcast on a large-screen monitor facing Lincoln Center's central plaza, a viewing that was free and open to the public and a first for New York City Ballet. The gala raised more than $1.8 million for the Company through the tireless efforts of Nina Griscom and Elizabeth Rohatyn, who chaired the event. Charles H. Townsend of Condé Nast Publications and Gregg G. Seibert of Merrill Lynch & Co., Inc., served as corporate chairmen with Condé Nast and Merrill Lynch providing major sponsorship.

The spring season continued with a two-week American Music Festival, from May 25 through June 6. The festival featured such beloved ballets as Balanchine's Ivesiana, Western Symphony, and Stars and Stripes and Jerome Robbins' Fancy Free and Glass Pieces, among other works set to the music of such diverse American composers as George Gershwin, Samuel Barber, Morton Gould, and John Cage. Peter Martins choreographed two new ballets for this festival. Chichester Psalms, set to the beautiful and haunting score by Leonard Bernstein, featured the Juilliard Choral Union, who gave voice to the work's Hebrew text on stage. Mr. Martins' second new ballet, Eros Piano, set to music for piano and orchestra, represented his latest collaboration with John Adams, one of the most esteemed of contemporary American composers. These works premiered on Wednesday, June 2 and were made possible in part by gifts from Dr. and Mrs. Raymond Sackler and AT&T, and an endowment fund established by the Solomon family in loving memory of Carolyn B. Solomon. The Jerome Robbins Foundation provided major support for the American Music Festival.

A three-week Russian Music Festival, presented from June 8 through June 27, rounded out the spring season. Among the highlights of the festival were many of the seminal works on which Balanchine collaborated with Igor Stravinsky or set to his music, including Symphony in Three Movements, Agon, Stravinsky Violin Concerto, Orpheus, Duo Concertant, and Firebird. The festival also featured a new ballet by the St. Petersburg-based choreographer Boris Eifman. Inspired by Balanchine's life and work and set to music by Tchaikovsky and Bach, Musagète premiered on Wednesday, June 18, marking the first time that Mr. Eifman had created a ballet for an American company. Musagète was supported in part by the Trust for Mutual Understanding and a dance commissioning grant from the New York State Council on the Arts.

On two occasions during the final week of the spring season, New York City Ballet shared the stage with one of Balanchine's favorite performing groups, the Georgian State Dance Company, which is based in his ancestral home of Tbilisi, Georgia. The Georgian State Dance Company also performed a full evening of its bravura dancing and sword fights to close the spring season on June 27, which drew a sold-out crowd and had audiences cheering. The Russian Music Festival was generously supported by a major gift from Mr. and Mrs. Howard Solomon.

New York City Ballet held its annual Dance with the Dancers fundraiser for the 20th year running on June 14. This popular event drew more than 800 younger patrons with its "Secret Agent (Shaken, Not Stirred)" theme and raised nearly $450,000 for the Company. Dancer chairmen Jenifer Ringer, James Fayette, and Daniel Ulbricht led the evening with event chairmen Jill Kargman, Jaqui Lividini, Amy Sacco, and Allison Sarofim, and corporate chairman David Pecker of American Media, Inc., whose SHAPE magazine generously sponsored the evening.

Throughout the spring season, 11 guest artists from some of the many ballet companies associated with Balanchine over his lifetime performed with New York City Ballet. Aurélie Dupont and Manuel Legris, both "étoiles" with the Paris Opéra Ballet, danced Balanchine's Sonatine as part of the French Tribute supported by the American Friends of the Paris Opera and Ballet/Eugenia Delarova Doll Fund that opened the European Music Festival. Noelani Pantastico and Olivier Wevers of the Pacific Northwest Ballet danced the second movement of Balanchine's Brahms-Schoenberg Quartet during that festival, and Lorna Feijóo of Boston Ballet and Gonzalo Garcia of San Francisco Ballet performed Balanchine's Ballo della Regina. During the American Music Festival, Tai Jimenez and Duncan Cooper from Dance Theatre of Harlem performed the leading roles in Balanchine's Stars and Stripes. Amy Aldridge of the Pennsylvania Ballet danced Balanchine's Tarantella with NYCB soloist Joaquin De Luz. Angel Corella of American Ballet Theatre joined NYCB a guest during the Russian Music Festival to perform the leading male role in "Theme and Variations," the final movement of Balanchine's Tschaikovsky Suite No. 3. Caroline Cavallo of the Royal Danish Ballet followed, dancing in Balanchine's Cortège Hongrois during the final week of the festival.

NYCB's music staff played major roles in presenting the three music festivals that were the focus of the spring season. A number of guest conductors joined Andrea Quinn, Hugo Fiorato, and staff conductors Maurice Kaplow and Richard Moredock in leading the NYCB Orchestra throughout the season; among them, George Cleve, Paul Gemingnani, Richard Fletcher, and Paul Mann, and two young artists, Carolyn Kuan and Daniel Wachs, who were appointed as NYCB artists in residence last spring and will work with NYCB through the 2005 winter season. May 18 marked a major milestone as Mr. Fiorato, who had been with NYCB since its first performance and had held the title of Principal Conductor since 1989, led the NYCB Orchestra for the last time in that capacity; conducting a program that featured Balanchine's Ballo della Regina, Square Dance, and La Sonnambula. Mr. Fiorato was also named NYCB's first-ever Conductor Emeritus.

Thanks to extraordinary programming and an aggressive marketing campaign for Balanchine 100, New York City Ballet's 2004 winter and spring repertory seasons drew an audience of 246,404 people, representing an increase in attendance of more than 11 percent over the prior year.

Balanchine 100 would not have been possible without the participation of the many individuals, corporations, foundations, and government agencies that provided such exceptional support to the Company during this historic season. In particular, New York City Ballet extends deep appreciation to Mr. and Mrs. Howard Solomon and Gillian Atfield/Harriet Ford Dickenson Foundation for their extraordinary generosity.

New work presented throughout the Balanchine Centennial was generously supported by The Irene Diamond Fund, the Lila Acheson and DeWitt Wallace Endowment Fund, and New Combinations Fund members, as well as by those donors who made gifts for specific productions. The season was also made possible by lead gifts and grants from Altria Group, Inc., Mattel, Inc., The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, The Ambrose Monell Foundation, The Shubert Foundation, and the National Endowment for the Arts, New York State Council on the Arts, and New York City Department of Cultural Affairs. Lastly, NYCB extends special appreciation to contributors who supported the Repertory Fund, which helped to make possible the many special projects presented throughout the year.

Exhibitions, Publications, Films, and Lectures

Throughout Balanchine 100, New York City Ballet presented a number of special programs and activities to broaden understanding of Balanchine's creative genius and his many contributions—as choreographer, musician, teacher, and director—in shaping classical dance in the 20th century. The New York City Ballet Archive was an indispensable resource for many of these activities.

The Balanchine Centennial Exhibition, which NYCB mounted at the New York State Theater for display during the winter and spring repertory seasons, was one such endeavor. Curated by Edward Bigelow and designed by John Braden, both of whom worked with Balanchine, the exhibit featured dozens of archival photographs and other images documenting Balanchine's life and work. Displays of recently restored archival costumes and scenic elements were also part of this exhibit. NYCB published a companion catalogue to the exhibit, edited by Mr. Bigelow and Nancy Norman Lassalle (whose association with Balanchine predates Ballet Society, one of Balanchine's early companies), so that many of the rare images and items displayed as part of the exhibition could be enjoyed beyond the centennial year. The exhibition and companion catalogue were made possible by generous contributions from Color By Pergament, Phoenix Printing Company, Barbara Irene Lovenheim Charitable Trust, and Joel and Anne Ehrenkranz.

With support from Pantone, the Company also produced Balanchine 100: A Commemorative Journal with essays written by Roland John Wiley, Nancy Reynolds, NYCB Music Director Andrea Quinn, Solomon Volkov, and Deborah Weisgall on specific aspects of the celebration. In addition to the essays, the journal features many wonderful photographs, both historic and of the current Company, and includes a listing of the repertory performed during the centennial year.

One of the highlights of the season was a series of five in-depth seminars that examined the span of Balanchine's career beginning with Balanchine: An Eternal Present, featuring Balanchine biographer Bernard Taper. Merrill Ashley, Suki Schorer, and Kay Mazzo, all former Balanchine ballerinas and now teachers and coaches of his work and technique, led a session that illuminated the elements that distinguish a Balanchine dancer from all others. Other seminars focused on the male and female dancers who exemplified his style, and on the composers and musical partnerships that influenced his work. A number of important artistic figures from different eras in the Company's history participated, including Edward Villella, Arthur Mitchell, Violette Verdy, Karin von Aroldingen, Melissa Hayden, Allegra Kent, and Jacques d'Amboise. On average, each seminar drew an audience of 1,000 or more people, providing those who attended with an opportunity to learn about Balanchine from those who worked directly with him and helped define the Company. Also offered was a series of pre-performance Ballet Insights, which enabled audience members to hear dancers discuss the works they were going to see.

interviewed and these videotapes were placed in the archive.

Archival film footage, recently restored and transferred to digital format, proved particularly useful during Balanchine 100. The Company screened select clips of Balanchine's life and work at NYCB seminars and symposia, as well as for the Live From Lincoln Center broadcast of NYCB's Spring Gala. This broadcast was viewed by hundreds of thousands of people on PBS stations across the nation and won an Emmy Award. The feature-length documentary film of the Company's historic return to St. Petersburg, Russia in the summer of 2004—produced by Enlighten Entertainment with assistance from Earle I. Mack and narrated by Kevin Kline—also incorporated archival images.

Balanchine 100 provided a wonderful opportunity to build the Company's archival records. Throughout the year, NYCB conducted video interviews with many former Balanchine dancers who returned to NYCB to participate in public programs and attend performances, including one special evening when alumni of the Company were invited to gather together. Choreographers creating new ballets for the Company over the course of the year were also During Balanchine 100, the ongoing, behind-the-scenes work of building the NYCB Archive continued apace. Projects included the restoration of scrapbooks containing photographs, news clippings, and letters that had been donated by Ballet Society and the Estate of Tanaquil LeClercq. NYCB also conducted a thorough assessment of costumes that had been warehoused over the years. As a result, some 400 items encompassing tutus, leotards, tunics, and headpieces were cleaned, documented, and stored in special archival boxes, while another 200 were set aside for special research purposes. Approximately 120 historically significant photographic prints were made from archival negatives, and 83 boxes of news clippings were scanned, digitized, and put onto CD-ROM for future research and access. Over the course of the year, archival staff responded to 220 requests for access to materials and information and provided assistance to researchers who visited the archive on more than 80 occasions at its temporary space on upper Broadway. A search for a permanent home for the archive, ideally a larger climate-controlled space in closer proximity to Lincoln Center, is under way. Leadership support for the NYCB Archive was provided by Judith McDonough Kaminski and Joseph Kaminski, and by Save America's Treasures, a partnership of the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Park Service.

Balanchine 100: A Commemorative Journal

This special commemorative journal was given to all NYCB subscribers as a keepsake of Balanchine 100: The Centennial Celebration.

During both the fall and spring sessions, participating choreographers had an opportunity to attend dance performances and visual arts exhibitions around the city, and to engage in informal discussions about their work with Peter Martins and other artistic personnel at NYCB as well as one another. In the fall, current and past NYCI participants were invited to attend a panel discussion organized and moderated by NYCB Music Director Andrea Quinn with a group of professional composers, some of whom have written for dance or have had dance set to their music. The panel included John Corigliano, David Lang, Steve Mackey, Augusta Read Thomas, and Michael Torke.

During 2004, the New York Choreographic Institute continued its series of symposia profiling choreographers whose work and influence have profoundly shaped classical dance. It was only natural that during Balanchine's centennial year the symposium would be focused on his life and work. Richard Tanner moderated the symposium, which took place on March 23 and featured panelists Barbara Horgan, Peter Martins, Violette Verdy, Francina Russell, and Kent Stowell.

Education and Outreach

Having come to New York in 1933 and himself the beneficiary of patronage from many quarters, Balanchine always believed greatly in giving back to the city he came to call home. This began with performances for students in the early 1960s, which were then enhanced by lecture demonstrations offered in schools in the early 1970s, and in turn grew into curriculum-based programs that the Company has now conducted in the city's public schools for 20 years. During Balanchine's centennial year, New York City Ballet continued to provide students in New York City public schools and the surrounding areas with opportunities to learn about ballet as well as explore their own creative potential.

Ballet Bridges is a multidisciplinary program that integrates movement with the academic subjects being studied at participating grade levels and is designed to meet state and city learning standards for what students should know about dance. In 2003-2004, the program reached nearly 1,100 elementary and middle school students from 16 different schools over a five-month period. Through a curriculum that included nine classroom lessons and 12 movement workshops led by teaching artists, students were able to draw connections between language arts, history, and other subjects and their own active experience with dance. They also visited Lincoln Center to attend a special demonstration of ballet steps and excerpts of NYCB repertory danced by advanced students from the School of American Ballet, as well as a free matinee performance at the New York State Theater where they had the chance to see several ballets fully staged.

More than 1,500 fourth- and fifth-grade students from 32 schools across the five boroughs participated in another of NYCB's signature school-based programs, The Nutcracker Project, which uses George Balanchine's The Nutcracker™ as the centerpiece for developing language skills and artistic expression. Students attended a free performance of this holiday classic and participated in a series of five workshops with teaching artists where they experimented with movement, music, visual arts, and writing. Teenagers were introduced to New York City Ballet and its repertory through the New York City Ballet Workout High School Program, a comprehensive exercise program that incorporates ballet technique and movement and teaches the discipline required of dancers. Some 1,100 students in 20 public high schools across the city chose the Workout as their physical education elective.

New York City Ballet also provided many opportunities for the entire family to learn about George Balanchine and New York City Ballet. The Family Fun Series offered four family-friendly matinee performances- three all-Balanchine programs and one performance of The Sleeping Beauty-while a pre-performance lecture series, Family Insights, gave families a hands-on introduction to music, lighting, acting, and other aspects of presenting ballet on the stage. Ballet for Young People, an hour-long program held during the winter season that actively involves children in the audience, was led by Christopher Wheeldon and Andrea Quinn together with NYCB dancers and advanced SAB students, who discussed and demonstrated the relationship between music and choreography in a variety of Balanchine ballets, including those with children's roles. Approximately 1,000 children and their parents participated. Members of NYCB's Family Circle enjoyed additional special events and educational activities throughout the year, including four "Meet the Artist" programs where children and parents together learned about the world of classical dance directly from artists in the Company.

Generous support for New York City Ballet's education and outreach programs in 2003- 2004 was provided by the Rose M. Badgeley Residuary Charitable Trust, The Barker Welfare Foundation, The Mitchell and Margo Blutt Family Foundation, The Bodman Foundation, Donya and Scott Bommer, Judy and Nick Bunzl, The Louis Calder Foundation,

Citigroup, The Dreitzer Foundation, Edith and Henry† Everett, The Charles H. Leach, II Foundation, Mattel, Inc., MetLife Foundation, The J. P. Morgan Chase Foundation, Belle and Murray L. Nathan, Oceanic Heritage Foundation, The Picower Foundation, and Verizon Communications. †Deceased

Reaching New Audiences through Expanded Internet Technology

New York City Ballet's website-www.nycballet.com-continued to play a critical role in the Company's ability to reach people world-wide and enhance their understanding of ballet as an art form and cultural entertainment option. Building upon the rich content already offered on the site, the Company offered an expanded range of dynamic Web programming in 2003-2004 to create excitement surrounding the Balanchine Centennial and encourage participation from those who are new to ballet.

In October 2003, NYCB launched a special Balanchine 100 component of its website with extensive details about Mr. Balanchine's life and career, including a comprehensive bio, interactive timeline, music clips from his ballets, online moderated chat rooms with former Balanchine dancers, webcasts of NYCB seminars and symposia on Balanchine, and a comprehensive online posting of performances, exhibits, festivals, film series, lectures, and other programming worldwide dedicated to Mr. B during his centennial year. NYCB's Balanchine 100 site won a gold medal in the 2004 Horizon Interactive Awards, silver medal in the Summit Awards, and a Web Marketing Association 2004 Outstanding Website WebAward.

Awards aside, the website's significance in reaching new and potential audiences was evidenced by more than 3.2 million visits during the year, an increase of 1.1 million over 2002-2003. Daily online visits topped 10,000 on 16 occasions, a phenomenon unprecedented in the field of dance and matched only by the very largest of arts institutions around the globe. Forty-one percent of individuals who had never attended a NYCB repertory performance (though they may have attended George Balanchine's The Nutcracker™) purchased their tickets online. New repertory season subscriptions purchased online were up 30 percent, Web ticket sales for George Balanchine's The Nutcracker™ accounted for 31 percent of all sales to this popular holiday production, and online student rush ticket sales increased 27 percent. Overall, total online revenue increased by 38 percent over 2002-2003.

The success of the website in building new audiences is due in great part to continued generosity from Gillian Atfield/Harriet Ford Dickenson Foundation. Thanks also go to the William H. Kearns Foundation, which has funded audience development efforts via online means, including the availability and processing of student rush tickets.

Salute to Our Volunteers

As always, New York City Ballet's 350 volunteers were an important resource during the 2003-2004 season, but were even more invaluable because of the expanded demands of Balanchine 100. Throughout the year, volunteers staffed the NYCB Gift Shop and information tables during performance hours, gave docent talks and tours of the Balanchine Centennial Exhibition to audience members, and sold commemorative journals. These dedicated individuals also wrote special repertory notes to provide audiences with a deeper understanding of Balanchine's classical heritage and modern vision, the two rubrics under which the Centennial Celebration was presented, and spearheaded a letter-writing campaign that was instrumental in securing approval for a Balanchine commemorative stamp issued by the U.S. Postal Service in 2004. Balanchine 100 offered many reasons to celebrate and volunteers were essential in executing New York City Ballet's five major fundraising events, as well as the birthday celebration for Mr. B on January 22 and the salute to Principal Conductor Hugo Fiorato on May 18. In the spring of 2004, when nearly 200 former NYCB dancers returned to the New York State Theater for an alumni weekend, volunteers were on hand to interview those who had worked with Mr. Balanchine. This was a rare opportunity to record the memories of many former dancers and these interviews have since been placed in the New York City Ballet Archive.

Jerome Robbins' Glass Pieces.

Volunteers once again played an important role in facilitating theater logistics for NYCB education programs, including seminars, two student matinees, and the Ballet for Young People program. On Monday mornings throughout the year, volunteers with teaching experience served as educators for a special program that provided more than 900 preschool to second-grade students with an engaging introduction to New York City Ballet. Students watched video clips of NYCB performances, handled costumes and pointe shoes, and visited the orchestra pit and backstage area. Special assistance was provided to students with learning or physical disabilities to enable their participation.

Volunteers also staffed the reception desk for NYCB's Rose Building rehearsal studios and offices and the Green Room donor lounge at the New York State Theater, helped to coordinate and implement rehearsal visits for the 1,000-plus patrons who attended this year, and provided administrative support to NYCB's development, marketing, and special events departments. During the spring season, more than 100 volunteers helped to survey audience members as part of a market research effort aimed at better understanding NYCB audiences and their motivations for attending performances.

Altogether, volunteers contributed more than 30,000 hours of service and were a tremendous help during the celebration.

The Campaign for New York City Ballet

The Campaign for New York City Ballet was begun in 1999 to grow NYCB's core endowment and thereby enable the Company to underwrite a greater percentage of its annual budget from investment income. It was also the foundation upon which several major new initiatives were launched; among them, the New York Choreographic Institute, New York City Ballet Archive, the Artist in Residence program, and a Media Fund to enable NYCB to undertake or participate in special projects for film, television, and the like. During 2003-2004, many loyal patrons made gifts and pledges to the campaign. NYCB received important gifts for unrestricted endowment from Louisa Stude Sarofim, who added to earlier gifts made for this purpose, David and Kathryn Heleniak, Judith McGrath, Thomas and Patricia Shiah, Naomi and Joel Freedman, and an anonymous donor, and a lead gift from Earle I. Mack for the Media Fund. NYCB also received generous endowment gifts from Annie and Art Sandler and The Horace W. Goldsmith Foundation for the New York Choreographic Institute, and Arlene C. Cooper, who increased her commitment for the Jerome Robbins Fund. Salvatore and Alice Federico, Melissa and Nicholas Biondi, Sally Dessloch, and Gale and Stephen Dinces contributed generously for the general endowment fund as well.

An appeal to New York City Ballet Guild members begun in 2003 continued this year, with nearly 2,000 Guild members responding generously. As of June 30, more than $1.2 million had been raised through this effort, bringing the total received for the campaign to $47.4 million against a final goal of $51.5 million.
